And any movement in opposition to this well-marked tendency cannot be regarded as other than an attempt to render abortive this rapidly increasing power of the people. 2. The large two-house legislature is a training school for those who govern us. If only aifew could take part in the cgreat business of government, our statesmen must necessarily be few, having but limited opportunity to see the principles of government applied in actual practice and could hardly be expected to acquire the facility in the expression of the popular will which is a prime requisite in real statesmanship. Our legislatures have been the real training schools for distinguished 7 than of a large number. statesman in the past. There is scarcely a statesman of national reputation since the inauguration of our government more than a century ago who did...
