Not illustrated. 1895 Excerpt: . . . next assertion of yours which it is worth while for me to take up, resumed the Professor, is that referring to the general decline of the prices of commodities. As in all your arguments, Mr. Coin, you attribute it to the demonetization of silver, and deny that improvements in production have anything to do with the matter. You have been accustomed to quote from the tables of Mr. Augustus Sauerbeck to substantiate some particular theory or idea with which you happened, from time to time, to be laboring. Allow me to call your attention to, the fact that Mr. Edward Atkinson, our ablest statistician, and a man who holds a foremost place among our American thinkers, has recently shown--and largely through Mr. Sauerbecks own figures--that there is not a single commodity in use, whether an article of food, of wearing apparel, or of mineral or timber...
