Not illustrated. 1907 Excerpt: . . . upon the proper management of the voice, as to time, pitch, quality and force, , and the pupil should be so drilled in these that he will instinctively choose aright. . . , He should learn the value of emphasis--not that emphasis gained by a great force of tone, or downward inflection, but that which is gained through a gentle, insinuating holding back of a word, a pausing after a word, or a prolonging of the vowel, which results in arresting the attention of the hearer. Let me say--and repeat, that all this training, while being vitally necessary to good oral reading, should be preparatory to the reading hour and not a part of it. The reading hour through the grammar grades should be given wholly to getting the thought, holding the thought--and giving the thought from the printed page. Oral reading is of great value if well taught; it has for its highest aim the interpretation of literature; an artistic rendering is the most effective means of interpretation, and gives enjoyment little less, if any, than that of well-rendered music. But good, silent reading is of far greater importance, since the great army of boys and girls who leave our schools rarely engage in oral reading. That is left mainly for the public reader and speaker--and for the actor. The pupils, therefore, should be trained to good, effective silent reading; they should learn how to grasp speedily and comprehensively, the contents of a page. This...
